Jan Steinbright is an artist, writer, and oral historian who has worked with programs involving Alaska Native culture for more than twenty years. She lives aboard a tugboat in Sitka from which she combs the waters of Sitka Sound for kelp for her unusual baskets. She has also edited Howard Luke: My Own Trail. Clark James Mishler's photography has been published in numerous regional, national, and international publications including Parade, Geo, U.S. News and World Report, Smithsonian Air and Space, Time, and National Geographic. He has received two Awards of Excellence for his photography from Communication Arts Magazine. --This text refers to an out of print or unavailable edition of this title.

This is a story about why these boats were made, not how they were made. It was an interesting story of how a native people are trying (and largely succeeding) to hang on to an important tradition. Boatbuilding, not so much...

Qayaqs & Canoes: Native Ways of Knowing by writer/editor Jan Steinbright is a superb presentation of simple, traditionally made water craft among Alaska's Native American population, and the people who build and use them today. Illustrated with gorgeous color photographs taken by Clark James Mishler, and filled with countless personal interviews, Qayaqs & Canoes is a truly beautiful book and very highly recommended reading for anyone interested in learning about the means by which Alaska's Native Americans have traveled the sea from time immemorial.
